

Expanding Your Customer Base During a Pandemic

Discussion Ideas & Tips

As a result of the pandemic, many businesses have made changes to their business model to attract new customers and better leverage the potential of their existing customer base to expand revenue-generating opportunities. A discussion regarding the types of changes businesses have made and are considering was held with 18 tourism operators and professionals.

Tactical Practical Take-Aways

During times of rapid change it is important to review what you know and make predictions about where things might be headed. At 40 Knots Winery this meant taking the following steps:

1. Identifying the revenue streams that were growing and had the most potential vs. those in decline or stagnating.
2. Identifying the highest value customers – those who spend the most, visit more frequently and purchase a variety of products.
3. Prioritizing high value current and past customers – it costs more to find new customers than to bring back current and past customers.
4. Identifying complementary products for revenue streams that took a hit – e.g., develop tours and classes (small events) to replace lost revenues from large events such as weddings.
5. Identifying and capitalizing on market trends – e.g., wellness and the introduction of Vinospa skincare.
6. Focusing on investments that support long-term business sustainability.

Ideas generated at the most recent session

Businesses are discovering new customer segments and adapting product and marketing methods to meet their needs.

- Focusing on the Millennial and Gen Z cohorts rather than the Baby Boomers, has allowed businesses to develop and test new experiences and products with these new young segments.
- Developing events/experiences for smaller groups, such as offering an elopement package instead of the wedding package. While the numbers are smaller there is a market for smaller more intimate events
- Adopting environmental, sustainable and socially responsible practices are becoming reasons for consumer choice and will appeal to consumers with these values.
- Building sustainability goes beyond environmental practices to include support for local economies; 40 Knots Winery is transparent in telling their story of commitment to community sustainability through their 'Economic Distribution Label'.
- Developing product for the local market presents the opportunity to build pride of place and future ambassadors. It can also provide an opportunity to pilot new experiences.
- Using subscription models, memberships and pass programs as a way to build repeat business and loyalty. Food establishments and others have been doing this effectively and while this may lessen post pandemic there are some who will continue with these types of experiences.

- Sharing customers through partnerships with other businesses that sell different products to the same types of customer can open both businesses to a new customer base.
- Telling stories in new and creative ways may be even more important to businesses that closed through COVID-19 than to those that remained open. Consumers need to know that businesses are still planning to open and what is being done to prepare for the future. Think of it as selling the promise of being ready once able to open. Businesses risk becoming less relevant if they are not telling their story.
- Ensuring a strong web presence and showcasing stories about the business and what it is doing can be helpful in generating partnerships and media stories.

Additional Ideas from previous sessions

Previous sessions of this topic addressed business model innovations taken to attract new customers.

Actions taken or being considered included:

- Cultivating stronger relationships with their best customers. Reaching out to check in with customers to see how they are doing and developing loyalty and referral programs as a way to build business amongst a like-minded clientele. Businesses that build stronger relationships with their customers are likely to be in a better position when consumers are able to travel.
- Diversifying revenue streams as a means to address losses. Changes included:
  - Developing new revenue streams by moving the experience online. DIY kits where customers are provided with all the elements to create something as well as access to a video or live streamed session that shows how to make it have been new revenue sources for a variety of businesses, especially those that held craft workshops or cooking classes.
  - Focusing on sales channels that offer the highest returns. For 40 Knots Winery this meant an increased focus on their farm gate sales. Others have developed their online sales channels – ecommerce platforms, listing with others (e.g., Airbnb).
  - Offering classes to new markets interested in learning new skills or trying new activities, but who have no experience, has helped Blue Jellyfish SUP Adventures create an engaged customer base that is interested in taking their multi-day SUP tours once able to travel.
- Blue Jellyfish is also exploring opportunities to deliver the skills training elements of their paddling experience (e.g., teaching safety protocols, navigational skills and general paddling techniques) online. These skills could be offered as stand-alone offers to generate supplementary revenue and/or as part of the pre-arrival experience to reduce the time spent on land vs. on water when visitors are antsy to get the activity started.
- Evolving from selling typical souvenirs that appeal to tourists, to sell products that are more appealing to local markets, or aficionados of the base product/experience (e.g., specialty wine tools, wine salts and other food items, etc.).
- Building new revenue streams that align with and extend the core business, making it easier to cross sell the new products to existing customers. Additionally, if the new products support the core business they are likely to be around for the long term.
- Moving to year round operations. While this may require development of new experiences it can make better use of the business' assets.
- Adapting to offer experiences for small private groups rather than large groups. Alternatively, some businesses are offering semi-supported tours that provide participants with access to the activity, the places in which to do it, recommendations on accommodations and route planning but the participant has their own vehicle and meets the guide at set locations.
- Developing new markets/products that address emerging consumer trends. Trends identified included:
  - Accessibility – businesses are looking at infrastructure changes, experience design modifications as well as collaborating with others to create a cluster of accessible and inclusive businesses in the community.
  - Wellness – businesses are looking at developing products/experiences on their own, or in collaboration with others, to address visitors' desire to develop and maintain healthy lifestyles.
  - Supporting local – businesses are interested in creating sustainable, local economies that reduce revenue leakage through community hubs that bring together local businesses into a collaborative marketplace (e.g., Glohaven).

Such marketplaces also tap into travellers' desires for authentic local experiences and will be well received by locals and visitors alike.

- Local collaborations – Chambers of Commerce are working together to help people move beyond their community and discover others nearby. Staycations are creating opportunities for businesses to build a loyal local/regional clientele that will be happy to visit and recommend them to others once travel resumes.
- Environmental consciousness – moving to environmentally sustainable solutions such as organic and biodynamic agricultural practices and low carbon transportation solutions.
- Communities of interest – people enjoy and want to share their passions. Businesses that are able to adapt their offer and tap into these niche communities can build an interesting and loyal following as Historic Chilcotin Lodge did when they created a 50's style burger drive-in that attracted vintage car enthusiasts.
- Creating operational efficiencies can also provide improvements. Some of the efficiencies businesses identified are:
  - Accommodation providers have modified the check-in process (i.e. touchless and/or online), resulting in a more streamlined guest experience.
  - Use of tools such as Tock has allowed businesses to communicate with customers and monitor their experience throughout the customer journey, resulting in better customer experiences and the ability for the business to address a negative situation before it harms their reputation.

- CRM tools can streamline and facilitate engagement with customers to strengthen relationships and increase loyalty.
- Business investments in technology (e.g., ecommerce platforms, CRM, apps, etc.) and new technology-related partnerships have supported rapid entry into the digital world. Given that the next generation of travellers (Gen Z) are digital natives, businesses will need to be more than digitally proficient and have a 'digital first' mindset to be sustainable in the long run.
- Investments in education and training to improve staff and management capabilities, especially related to applying new technology have been an approach many have taken during the pandemic.

"If the pandemic taught me anything, it is that you need to stay relevant to realize your potential. You must constantly be studying your customer and reaching out to them. Constantly adjust - be fluid."
